The "Compromise of Arrears" Debt Reduction Program

The "Compromise of Arrears Program" or COAP (pronounced "cope") is a program for eligible parents with past-due child support payments to reduce the amount they owe to the government. This debt, called "arrears", is owed to the government if your dependent children received public assistance (welfare) or were in foster care while you were not paying court-ordered child support. Those programs are paid for by the state using taxpayer dollars, and federal and state law require that you reimburse the state for supporting your children during that time.

If you qualify, you will be able to offer a "compromise" repayment to the state. In other words, you may offer to reduce the debt by paying an amount that is less than the full amount you owe. Any reduction in your arrears and interest owed will be based on your income and assets.

Each person's child support case, or cases, is different. Arrears may be paid off all at once in a lump sum, or over time in a payment plan, depending upon the details of your case.

Any compromise agreement must take into consideration the needs of the children named in the child support order and the parent's ability to pay.
